

DEDICATED TO THE PROMOTION OF TOWNS COUNTY OPINIONS & COMMENTARY

From the desk of STEPHEN ALLISON

February 5th marked Legislative Day 13, putting us more than a quarter of the way through the General Assembly's 40 day legislative session. This week debates continued on the House floor, committees considered dozens of bills and the House Appropriations committee delved further into the budget. The House of Representatives is expected to vote on the amended budget next week, which will set state spending levels through the end of June.

Over the past year, banks have also felt the pinch of the economic downturn. This week, the Georgia House of Representatives debated House Bill 926, which would allow state-chartered banks to more easily renew loans or lines of credit to customers in good standing. This is a necessary step to help Georgia's banks, businesses and citizens who rely on them. Current law prevents state-chartered banks from renewing or restructuring loans or credit for any customer if it would cause the bank to exceed the amount it can lend to a single borrower. House Bill 926 will assist Georgians by giving banks more flexibility and helping to ensure that financially responsible Georgians have the loans and credit they need to ensure their businesses can grow. The House also passed a series of education-related measures this week to give local school boards more flexibility and the tools they need to make the best decisions for their students, teachers, and schools. House Bill 905 extends sunset provisions for the school construction capitol outlay program from June 15, 2010 to June 30, 2015. This measure will enable school systems to continue to earn and use Advance Funding, Exceptional Growth, and Low Wealth School Capital Outlay Grants.

These bills, as well as all other legislation that came before the House floor this week, passed with overwhelming support. Each piece of legislation will now move to the state Senate and be studied by committees before moving forward in the process.

Finally, I would also like to mention a piece of legislation that was just introduced this week. As you know, water is such a crucial issue for our state. In the last few years, Georgia faced a devastating drought and ongoing litigation between Alabama and Florida that brought this issue to a head. In 2008, a law was passed to help build reservoirs throughout the state and improve conservation efforts. This week, House Bill 1094, the Georgia Water Stewardship Act, was introduced as a result of the hard work of Georgia's Water Contingency Task Force. I look forward to learning more about it as it makes its way through the committee process, and evaluating whether this bill is right for us in the mountains.

As we continue to move bills to the floor for a vote, I would like to know your opinions on these important issues. Please feel free to call me with any questions or comments that you might have regarding legislation or issues under consideration at the state capitol. You can reach me at my Capitol office at 404-656-0177. Thank you for your time.

The Middle Path

by Don Perry

Some days...some months, some years it is hard to avoid a certain cynicism with regards to the human condition that results from human action. Ecclesiastes tells us that all is vanity and vexation of spirit, but we know that this is not the whole of the truth so we keep trying, in faith and in hope that somehow our actions, in some small way, may serve some greater purpose. It is faith that sustains us when the results of our actions are not immediately apparent and when the cost of our material pursuits is our health and peace of mind. The ancients were wise in warning us that the fruits of our labors do not belong to us and that any action for the sake of reward is futile; that indeed the act itself must become the reward.

Five years ago we began this quest to communicate with the words of Samuel Adams who said, "It does not take a majority to prevail, but rather an irate, tireless minority keen to set brush fires in the minds of men." This was a journey born out of a widespread frustration with the condition and the direction of American life, disgust with American political theater and dismay at the dumbing down of the American mind.

It was a brushfire indeed that swept the Republicans out of power and brought "change" to America, but like a brushfire that burns along the surface of the ground, the fuel was quickly consumed and the fire went out. Very little has changed in any way that really impacts our lives. Some things are worse, and as the economy continues to wind down and unemployment goes up, fires are kindling once again. We will undoubtedly "punish" Washington once again by electing Pepsi instead of Coke, and again, at least for the time being, nothing will change.

The thing that makes the coffee bitter this Monday morning is the realization that after it is all said and done and regardless of the speeches and the promises that any politician will make from behind the facade of any political party, the debt of the United States is now mathematically impossible to pay. The debt of the United States now exceeds the combined assets of the citizens of the United States.

Our choices in this matter are few. We can default and deal with the unraveling of the world economy or we can unleash the hounds of hyperinflation, already straining at the leash. Neither alternative will be a pleasant one.

Unfortunately, my good neighbors and friends, I do not see a path that will avoid the undiscovered country of this wilderness that looms in front of us. We have allowed in the generations since World War II a government to develop that exists primarily to protect international business. It addresses the wants of the population only to the extent of what is needed to avoid anarchy and it gives lip service to social reforms as far as is necessary to swing blocs of voters. The actions of the Obama Administration in rescuing Wall Street on the heels of and in spite of the sentiments of the millions of voters that put them in office should illustrate clearly where we are on the list of priorities. It matters little whether Obama is a cynical front man for banking or a misguided idealist who truly believes that what is best for corporate America is also what is best for the country.

If there is any truth in Obama's speeches of recent weeks then what follows in the coming months may look something like this. Obama has spoken often of increasing exports and making American companies more competitive in order to rescue the economy, but in order to accomplish this, wages of American workers must adjust downward towards the wages paid by our "competitors" in the developing world.

Americans are not likely to readily accept a drastic cut in pay, "for the good of the country," but millions of workers unemployed for months on end may have little choice. The good paying job with benefits, already harder to find, may become scarce in the United States. Do not look for any meaningful action addressing unemployment in the short term.

Yes, problems we have aplenty. It is easy to find a problem. It is much harder to find a solution. In reviewing the archives of this column over the last several years we observe that our middle path has veered often towards the problems we face as a society and as a nation and we have sometimes followed that path without looking for alternate routes that were more hopeful.

We do not like the way that even a hint of cynicism and despair flavors our coffee and with your permission we would like to begin steering our efforts towards a more hopeful direction. Hope is not to be found in Washington, nor in Atlanta or even in Hiwassee. Hope begins with the individual and grows outward into the family, the church, the school, the community and onward. As best we can in the coming months we would like to speak more of those who have found solutions and renewed their hopes. We suspect that those who have - have done so by changing their attitudes, their habits and their expectations. We believe that there is a new paradigm growing in this country that is smarter, leaner and more flexible. We expect to be pleasantly surprised.
